Pingshi is a small town nestled in the mountains of New Taipei City, Taiwan. It is a popular destination for tourists seeking a taste of traditional Taiwanese culture. The town is known for its coal mining heritage, which dates back to the late 19th century. Pingshi was once a thriving coal mining town, but today it is a quiet and peaceful place that offers a glimpse into the past.

The town is located in the Jingtong Valley, which is surrounded by lush mountains and forests. The town is famous for its beautiful scenery, which includes several waterfalls and streams. Visitors can also explore the town's coal mining history, which is preserved in the Pingshi Coal Mine Museum.

Another popular attraction in Pingshi is the Jingtong Station, which is a historic train station that has been preserved as a museum. The station is located on the Pingxi Branch Line, which is a popular scenic train ride that runs through the scenic landscape of the Jingtong Valley.

The Jingtong Station is a simple stop on the train line, but it is a picturesque destination that offers visitors a glimpse into a bygone era. The station is located in the middle of a scenic mountain range, and visitors can enjoy the beautiful views of the surrounding landscape.

Another attraction in Pingshi is the Jingtongkeng, which is a popular swimming spot. The area is known for its clear and fresh spring water, which is said to have medicinal properties.

In addition to these attractions, Pingshi is also known for its traditional Taiwanese cuisine. Visitors can enjoy a variety of local dishes, including the famous Pingshi-style dumplings, which are filled with pork and cabbage.

Overall, Pingshi is a charming and scenic destination that offers visitors a glimpse into the past and a chance to experience traditional Taiwanese culture.
